		Subtitle: Managing Relationship Conflict
		NOTE: Close, personal, and romantic relationships can be blissful. The love and support of a partner can make the difference between a state of inner peace and going the deep end. But what happens when relationships start to go sour and arguments become common? How can partners manage relationship conflict so that neither of them gets badly hurt, and the relationship does not suffer? Simply stated, are there good ways parties can turn relationship conflicts around and rescue their relationship? Is 'getting it out into the open' necessarily a good thing? This course is designed to explore the field of close relationships and its attendant conflicts. Major theories of close relationships, including evolutionary, attachment, interdependence, and cognitive theories, will be discussed. It will also explore related research concepts of attraction, relationship

		Subtitle: Inter-generational Conflict
		NOTE: With advancement in health sciences and technologies, Americans (and other people around the world) are living and working longer. One major implication of this trend is that the average American inescapably faces and deals with people of different generational cohorts. At homes, schools, malls, movie theaters, churches, parks, beauty parlors, and workplaces, the average American daily negotiates relationships with family, friends, neighbors, and strangers of multigenerational diversity. In the workplace, there are at least five active generations: Silent Generation (Mature), Baby Boomers, Generation X, Generation Y (Millennials), and Generation Z. With this multi-generational diversity come different values, goals, perspectives, preferences, experiences, quirks, stereotypical prejudices, and their attendant conflicts. From conflict and
